Advice for Living

Advice for Living: Me Time

Have you ever looked forward to some me-time, only to have someone ask you to do something or go somewhere? Did you change your me-time plans and do the thing that was asked of you instead? What happened to your me-time?

Me-time is important. I was so excited that I would have about 1.5 hours of me-time with no one in the house last week. I imagined quietly reading a book in the hammock or on the couch while eating a freshly prepared giant yummy salad. Ahhhh. Peace and tranquility.

In my me-time vision, I didn't account for returning home from work to a sink full of dirty dishes, mess on every surface and dogs in need of attention. You may guess how my precious me-time was spent.

To add insult to injury, I wasn't even able to get it all done before my next appointment. So, if anyone saw the kitchen they may have wondered if I had lifted a finger. Though I made progress on the tasks in need of completion, in retrospect my me-time was wasted. Have I learned my lesson? Maybe...

I am consciously being more accountable to the needs of my self. Even when it's hard to say no.

No one knows all the tasks, responsibilities and schedules you manage but you. No one knows what capacity you have but you. Who will hold you accountable to your me-time but you?
